

Multimedia Library Collection: Archival Gems

Photograph: Suna River, 1915

Prokudin-Gorsky, Sergey

Sergey Prokudin-Gorsky (a pioneer of color photography) shoots a self-portrait in front of Suna River near the Kivach waterfall (1915). 1915 photograph by Sergey Prokudin-Gorsky (1863–1944). Click here to view LOC source.

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Public Domain Mark 1.0 License.

Sergey Prokudin-Gorsky (a pioneer of color photography) shoots a self-portrait in front of Suna River near the Kivach waterfall in 1915. (Photograph by Sergey Prokudin-Gorsky. Public Domain.)

This image appears in: Suzi, Grigory. “Losing the Unruly Stream: Kondopoga and the Kivach Waterfall.” Environment & Society Portal, Arcadia 2013, no. 11. Rachel Carson Center for Environment and Society. <https://doi.org/10.5282/rcc/5417>.

The Kivach waterfall is the second-highest cascade waterfall after the Rhine Falls, and is situated on the river Suna in Karelia. The first Russian health resort, Marcial Waters—founded by Tsar Peter I in 1719—is located a few kilometers away. The Kivach waterfall is 10.7 meters high, including three additional small cascades. When the famous Russian poet Gavrila Derzhavin (1743–1816) visited Kivach in the late eighteenth century, the Suna’s “unruly stream” inspired him to write his important poem The Waterfall (1794). However, since Derzhavin’s time, both stream and waterfall have changed considerably.

—Grigory Suzi

Read more here.

Websites linked in this text:

- <https://doi.org/10.5282/rcc/5417>
- <https://www.environmentandsociety.org/arcadia/losing-unruly-stream-kondopoga-and-kivach-waterfall>

Websites linked in image captions:

- <http://www.loc.gov/pictures/resource/ppmsc.04652/?co=prok>