A 1996 primer by the Native Forest Council introduces the dire situation of America’s national forests, its origins, and explains why it continues. It introduces the National Forest Protection Acts draft legislation and suggests concrete ideas for what citizens and activists can do to stem deforestation.

> America’s national forests belong to the entire nation; to present and future generations. They provide us with many enduring and essential values beyond wood and paper. They moderate the climate, produce oxygen and clean water, are the source of medicines, prevent flooding, support healthy fisheries, and contribute to the quality of our lives.
